Researching and learning about religions at the Museum of Religions at the Philipps University Marburg, Germany - Religious objects between University and museum

The Marburg Museum of Religions is the oldest museum of its kind worldwide. Since the museum is associated with the Department of the Study of Religions, its collection is displayed and organised based on a study-of-religions-approach. Therefore the connection between both institutions is mutually beneficial: Teaching and research are enhanced by the presence of a diverse collection of religious artefacts, while the significance of the objects themselves is continually deepened through their ongoing scholarly study.
